

The professor who puts over a heavy pun, understanding of which demands intimate knowledge of Xenophon's Anabasis, early Greek history, and a little Sanskrit.

Charlie, under guise of taking notes, figures how he can pay the F street clothier.

"Perhaps, if I may be allowed to put that last in a little different way, we may say: so to speak."

Prof. Kohol has finished his talk fifteen minutes too soon and is stalling until the end of the hour.

AMONG US MORTALS

COLLEGE LIFE IN WASHINGTON

Drawn by W. E. HILL.

Tom, who prefers to go out to Bowie to study for exams: "What's the use of plugging for an exam, when everybody knows he only passes every third paper."

Roger, who went to Baltimore last night and didn't have a chance to study up, is not getting the expected promptings from his friends in Latin translation.

Eddie has a terrible morning headache and is awfully proud of it. He is hoping some one will ask him where he got it, so he can tell them how to accumulate one in "dry" Washington.

The hard-working student employed in the Treasury Department days and goes to school nights always answers correctly when the rest of the class has failed. Not overpopular unless some one wants to borrow his notes.

The exam: "Contrast as briefly as possible, laying due emphasis on the casual qualities, the characters of Lady Macbeth and Tom Jones."

Jimmie, who has overcut the course five times and is worried about his mark, getting all ready to burst into uncontrollable laughter when the professor pulls the ancient pun.
